Abstract

The present invention relates to storing information including electronic ink. Ink is stored in a data structure that includes a mapping of the ink's coordinates from one space to another. The responsibility of transforming the ink into desired coordinates occurs after the capture of the ink and at least based on the mapping in the data structure.

Express Mail Label No. EL 929 176 868 US